Under any circumstances, the loss to an affectionate heart of his Rachel, of her who has been the delight of his eyes, more unto him in her single self than the whole world besides, yea, as his own soul, - such a loss, whatever be its attendant circumstances, must be the bitterest sorrow a man can pass through. It is not one of life s weaker and more distant ties, but a very heart-string which is snapped asunder. The arrow of affliction has fallen upon the very centre of feeling, in the point of keenest and most exquisite sensitiveness.
